The assistants in the science department were kept busy answering questions and telling where specialists could find the information they needed for the purpose of making some practical investigations. One man wanted to learn how a hostile Zeppelin could be exploded while in the air. This man possibly figured that if he were successful he might make his fortune by selling his secret to the British.

Another, realizing that many chemicals imported from Germany could not be obtained in this country, tried to find out from the books how they were made. Lanolin was one of the things one man wanted to learn about.

In the division devoted to technology the assistants were called on to furnish information about hydraulic checks, relief valves, the building of large conduits and specifications for ties on French railroads.

One reader wanted to learn how he could find a formula for giving aluminum a dark color. Another wanted information about tallow and still another how to make tracing cloth.
